

GLAMERICA

Five types of famous fashionista

WORDS ANDREA WEBER

CAMERA READY | For celebrities, "Who are you wearing?" is as common a question as "What is your next film project?" or "Are you a lesbian?" That's because one of the major benefits of the blazing hot spotlight of celebrity is setting the trends for the world to see. Here are five types of fashionista that have held their own in the scrutinizing, cruel world of Hollywood glamour.

THE ICON

When people think of Hollywood glamour, they first think of Marilyn Monroe. Her blond hair, those red lips and that sexy white halter dress blowing freely in The Seven Year Itch awarded Monroe eternal bombshell status. Her sultry look, considered racy by her own era, makes us all a little nostalgic for that classic Old Hollywood style.

THE PRINCESS

Elizabeth Taylor was a blockbuster screen legend. From peacoats to Cleopatra, her legendary beauty made style seem effortless. Even in black and white, her violet eyes could cast a spell over all of us. Like good Hollywood royalty, her personal life helped keep our interest. Hell, even her diamonds have their own memoir.

THE REBEL

Fashion rules in Hollywood are bound to change. Sharon Stone has opened up a couple of trends herself—and we're not just talking about her legs. Stone daringly wore her former husband's white button-down shirt with a ball skirt to the Oscars in 1999. She took a simple masculine basic and made it chic. Girls everywhere went to the nearest male closet to experiment. True, some famous fashion risks work better than others—remember Björk's disastrous dress made of down?—but confidence with a touch of daring is always in style.

THE CREATOR

Many celebrities use their name fame to launch their own fashion lines. Jessica Simpson, Lindsay Lohan and Sienna Miller have tried their hand. Simpson designs varied pieces like trendy shoes and bags. Lohan's label, 6126, produces ultra-sexy leggings. Sienna Miller, no matter how much her moral compass may sway, gives us worldly silhouettes with her line, Twenty8Twelve.

We love these ladies for the drama and style they bring us.

THE LEADER

America has elected a new style icon, Michelle Obama. The First Lady of the United States graces the pages and screens with movie star command. Mrs. Obama has been spotted in both new and established designers and even works the rack. The First Lady knows how to work a room in elegant couture like Jason Wu, Thakoon and ... J.Crew? What, oh what, will she wear next? Americans appreciate her down-to-earth taste and—of course—the glam of power.
